

"TIE UP TRACK"*WAS KING'S FAVORITE*So Witness Declares Before Senate*Rail Strike Committee.

That Clarence F. King, president of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, stated he would tie up the tracks of the company before he would recognize the union was the statement of Samuel G. Kelly, a striking conductor, before the Senate investigating committee yesterday afternoon.

Kelly testified that the statement was made on March 30, the time that he was urged to sign the individual contract. He refused to sign. He said the committee adjourned at 5:30 p. m., only four witnesses in rebuttal of the company's testimony remained and their evidence will be taken, arguments made and the hearing closed at the session which began today at 9:30 o'clock.

Against the company's objection the Amalgamated introduced statements from nine witnesses, showing wages paid and the aggregate amount in ten years which individual employees earned over the amount paid by the Washington Railway and Electric Company in the same period. The committee heard that the company could introduce any statistics it might have that would impeach the truthfulness of those introduced by the Amalgamated.

Attorney James H. Vahey, counsel for the Amalgamated, assumed responsibility for the pamphlet circulated among members of Congress telling of strikes conducted by the railroad. He said that President King had wilfully deceived the men in order to get the strike over his shoulder. "I told them," said Vahey, "that I didn't think he should be permitted to go away with the strike. That Congress had the power to adjust things to prevent a recurrence of such conditions."

Questioned as to his compensation, Attorney Vahey said: "I have as yet got nothing and I cannot say what I will be paid. I am not a strikebreaker. The Amalgamated showed that the organization of street car men had expended $250 in six months up to February 1 in cities where there were industrial disputes between the union and the companies, and about $500 for general expenses."

Frank M. Thompson, of the grievance committee of the union, caused a ripple of laughter when called to the stand to explain his work with the union. He said that he had previously testified that Thompson had failed to go to his job for a year because he would not join the union. Thompson testified that the difference between the wages of the union and the non-union men was $10,000. He said that he was not a strikebreaker. He said that he was not a strikebreaker. A Sure Cure for the Dis-*contented Wife.*By DONOTHY DIX.*The World's Highest Paid Woman*Writer.

The world is full of women who have drawn the capital prize in life, but who are too stupid even to return thanks to heaven for their luck. They have good husbands, good homes, good children, good clothes, and yet they are discontented and disgruntled, and always sighing for some intangible, unattainable career that they think they have missed by getting married.

For at the bottom of almost every woman's discontent with her lot, her dissatisfaction with her husband, and her distaste for domesticity, lies the secret belief that the only reason that she isn't world famous is because she permitted some man to lead her to the altar, instead of her going in for art, literature, or the stage, or finance.

That's the reason she is such a frigid and failure as a wife, mother, and housekeeper.

You couldn't expect a woman who is dead sure she is an embryo Helen Green to treat a husband who is a 30-a-week clerk with much respect. You couldn't look for a woman who is certain she can write novels like Ellen Glasgow's, or poetry like Theodosia Garrison's if she had turned her attention to it, to devote her mind to keeping the baby's milk bottle clean.

It would be absurd to suppose that a lady who felt that her real mission in life was to play Lady Macbeth could come down off her pedestal long enough to sweep under the bed, and see that the food is decently cooked.

It is a great pity that these women who think of themselves as awful sacrifices to matrimony, and who have risen up good and hard against the career they had chosen, should have shown to have knocked it out of their systems once and for all, and then to turn back and see that the house is a settled home, and a happy man to stand between her and the world.

If every woman had tried to support herself, if she had turned to her memory the weariness of long days in which she had toiled with an aching back, and tired feet, and had to pound through the blinding mists of a head-ache, hour after hour, upon a type writer, if she could recall the thousand little humiliations that a woman who has to work out of her own home is subjected to; if she had but to think of the long hours of the miserable lull in bed, and the dreary table of a fourth rate boarding house, and the cold and the cold dread of losing her job, and not being able to afford even that, and the constant worry of being few disconcerted, complaining, critical, wives in the world.

There is a kind of woman who is a good provider, is so insensible to her blarney because she has never known anything else. She has gone from her father's good home to her husband's good home, and she takes it for granted that her husband should work for her and provide for her, and it doesn't even occur to her that anything in the way of spoken thanks and actual tangible appreciation is due to the two men who have saved their lives to her comfort and well-being.

Of course no man who isn't a cad, wants his wife to go about blowing his horn and proclaiming that she supports his family, but a man likes to feel that the last word is spoken, that he does for her, that she not blind nor insensible to the sacrifice he makes, that she makes as well and live as well as her husband. Above all he likes her to be grateful to him, and he naturally expects her to be a domestic martyr.
